UNILOGOS ACCREDITATION

Accreditation process (valid academic credits)

ASIC accreditation for the university education sector is a voluntary and non-governmental process that recognizes institutions that meet established quality standards.

The purpose of accreditation is to assure the public, students, parents and other interested parties of the quality of an institution and its commitment to high standards through a system of continuous improvement.
The university is already accredited in its own country; however, ASIC certification confirms your commitment to internationalization and, in particular, your commitment to providing exemplary services to international students.

Our accreditation process consists of a set of key performance indicators divided into 8 main areas, namely;

A - Facilities, Health and Safety
B - Governance, management and human resources
C - Learning, teaching and research activity
D - Quality assurance and improvement
E - Student Welfare
F - Awards and qualifications
G - Student Recruitment and Marketing
H - Systems Management and Immigration Compliance

ASIC accreditation raises the profile of the university and confirms that it meets high standards of education, welfare and good practice. Our international accreditation assures students, parents and agents that the university is a good fit and will provide professional education, valuable qualifications and a positive learning experience.

What is ASIC's connection to the American educational system?

The American educational system recommends that universities have Accreditation processes so that their credits are valid, since the American system is not federalized.
For private universities, the main and recognized accreditation body is CHEA - Council for Accreditation in Higher Education

The United States does not have a Federal Ministry of Education or other centralized authority that exercises single national control over postsecondary educational institutions in this country. States assume varying degrees of control over education, but in general higher education institutions are able to operate with considerable independence and autonomy. As a result, American educational institutions can vary widely in the character and quality of their programs.

In order to ensure a basic level of quality, the practice of accreditation emerged in the United States as a means of non-governmental evaluation of educational institutions and programs. Regional or national private educational associations have adopted criteria that reflect the qualities of a sound educational program and have developed procedures for evaluating institutions or programs to determine whether or not they are operating at basic levels of quality.

CHEA: Council for Higher Education Accreditation - International Directory CHEA

The Council for Higher Education Accreditation (CHEA) is an American organization of degree-granting colleges and universities. It identifies its objective as the national promotion of self-regulation of academic quality through accreditation, in order to certify the quality of organizations that accredit higher education.

The organization has approximately 3,000 academic institutions as members and currently recognizes approximately 60 accredited organizations. It maintains an international directory that "contains contact information for 467 quality assurance agencies, accreditation agencies, and ministries of education in 175 countries.

Quality assurance and accreditation bodies have been authorized to operate by their respective governments. ASIC (Accreditation Services for International Schools, Colleges and Universities) is listed on the official CHEA website as an official international accreditation body recognized by a government. Recognition

Recognition is the scrutiny and affirmation of the quality of regional, national career-related, national faith-related and programmatic accrediting organizations. CHEA is the only nongovernmental higher education organization in the United States that undertakes this scrutiny. The federal government, through the U.S. Department of Education, conducts governmental recognition reviews.

CHEA Recognition Standards

Precis

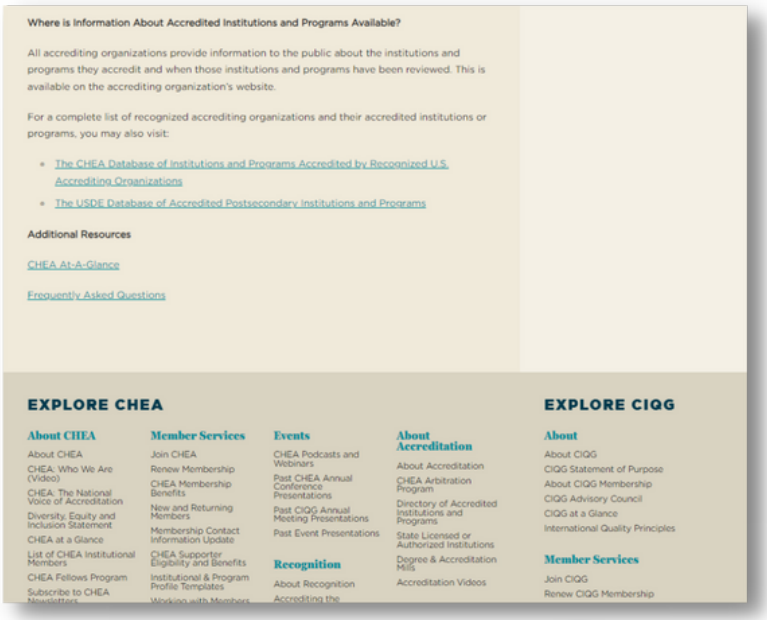

- Promotes academic quality and advances student achievement. Advancement of academic quality is at the core of accreditation. Accrediting organizations provide evidence that they implement and enforce standards, policies or procedures regarding the accrediting organization's expectations for academic quality and results associated with institutional or program performance.
- Demonstrates public accountability for performance and transparency. Public accountability for performance and transparency includes expectations related to the following three elements: (A) performance of accrediting organizations, (B) performance of accredited institutions or programs and, if applicable, (C) performance of accrediting organizations engaged in international activity.
- Sustains an effective accreditation structure and organization. A recognized accrediting organization provides evidence that it implements standards, policies and practices and sustains organizational characteristics consistent with CHEA requirements.

What is the Value of Accreditation?

Accreditation:

- Helps assure that a neutral, external party has reviewed, using appropriate peer expertise, the quality of education provided by an institution or program and offered suggestions for improvement.
- Provides for eligible students to have access to federal financial aid if they attend institutions accredited by accreditors that are recognized by USDE.
- Signals to prospective employers that an educational program has met widely accepted educational standards. A particular field may require graduation from an accredited program or institution

The ISO 9001 standard is an international standard for quality management systems (QMS) in organizations. It was developed by the International Organization for Standardization (ISO) and is widely recognized around the world. The objective of ISO 9001 is to establish criteria and guidelines for implementing an effective quality management system, which can help an organization improve its processes, products and services, and increase customer satisfaction.

ISO 9001 defines the requirements for a quality management system that can be applied to any type of organization, regardless of its size or sector of activity. It is based on a continuous improvement approach, in which the organization establishes and maintains efficient processes to meet customer requirements and strive for excellence.

The fundamental principles of ISO 9001 include customer focus, leadership, people involvement, process approach, continuous improvement, evidence-based approach and relationship management. The standard emphasizes the importance of planning, critical analysis of processes, performance measurement, risk management and data-based decision making.

By obtaining certification, UniLogos® demonstrates that it has a quality management system in compliance with the requirements of the ISO 9001 standard. This can provide benefits such as improving operational efficiency, reducing costs, increasing customer confidence and opening business opportunities.
